Key themes

Iwi social services and NGOs spend quality time with tamariki to understand their needs and enable their voice to be heard in plans and decisions.

Multi-agency partnerships support better outcomes for tamariki and rangatahi, however improved communication between these agencies is needed to support some tamariki to re-engage in education.

Tamariki and rangatahi struggle to access specialist health services, including mental health, disability services, and addiction support due to lack of services and long waitlists.

The responsibility to implement the Oranga Tamariki Action Plan needs to be shared between all agencies involved in the plan.

69% of eligible rangatahi in the region were referred to the transition support service between 12 and 36 months ago. 12% of eligible rangatahi were offered and declined to work with a Transition Support service within that time.

"[I needed mental health support for] well over a year ... That was huge for me. [I] called every psychologist just to hear no new clients. Even just to go privately, I knew OT carried weight, I shouldn't have to stamp my feet."
- Rangatahi

"If the kids are chucked on a short course with Te Kura, it looks like they're engaged, but it's not enough. It looks they're engaged, but they're not. By the time it gets back to us, some of them have not been engaged for over a year." - NGO kaimahi

"[OTAP is] hard to navigate because you're told these services need to pick up on it but you're sitting with this young person who needs this service but nothing is happening. So I have to do something else myself to make this happen, so we end up rescuing because services are pushing back and we end up scrambling".
