Key insights from Bay of Plenty and Central Plateau

The Oranga Tamariki review of community contracts has resulted in contracts that do not meet local needs.

Restructuring at Oranga Tamariki has increased frontline workload, putting tamariki and rangatahi at risk, and led to a greater reliance on community providers to pick up work they are not funded for.

There is a lack of frontline capacity to respond to reports of concern which may result in a high threshold for action and uncertainty about whether tamariki are safe. In Whakatāne, Te Pūkāea helps triage and respond to reports of concern, leading to the highest level of 'referrals or partnered responses' to community agencies in the region.

There is a shortage of suitable care options with some tamariki and rangatahi being placed in short-term or other accommodation that cannot support their specialised needs. Poor information sharing with caregivers exacerbates this and has led to further instability.

High thresholds and limited education and health services are preventing tamariki and rangatahi from getting the support they need to participate in education.

Transition services provide good support to rangatahi, but Oranga Tamariki needs to prioritise earlier referrals and provide more information.
